alive at the Columbia Theater last night, but she had a narrow escape and the audience was properly thrilled. "To be Buried Alive" was the title of the large summer estate called Sunnyside; play and the audience wasn't quite sure a small circular staircase in one wing just how it was going to turn out until of the house being the principal seat the deep-dved villain fell before the revolver of the woman-with-a-past in the last act. Then the curtain also fell.

Richard Gorton was the name of the villain. That wasn't his real name, for he was all sorts of a scoundrel and had found it convenient to use several Gorton hypnotized the fair Bessie, because Bessie had seen him throw the switch of a train to wreck it, in order that he might rob the dead and wounded, in order that-O, well, he was foiled by Bessie, so it doesn't matter what he intended to do.

"Unhand Her, Wretch!"

To escape due punishment for his dire deeds. Gorton threw a hypnotic spell about the heroine and she was about to be buried alive. So the title is accurate after all. She is about to be buried, when in dashes the sterling young lover, who exposes the past of the villain and compels him to bring Bessie back from the dead, as the program so aptly puts it.

Bessie comes back; also there comes in about this time the woman with the past-and a revolver-and she puts on the finishing touch.

Fred C. Stein, who played the part of the village postmaster, was the hit of the evening. "Lena Rivers" is the bill for tonight.

"Rattling Good" Detective Story in Circular Staircase.

THE literary market has been flooded during the last few years with detective stories, and with tales of mystery. There have been so many of these tales that a great number of them have been very similar in nature Deep-Dyed Hypnotist-Villain and construction, and have followed the conventional line of the detective story. Some, however, have been out of the orflinary in plot and construction, as those Jof Anna Katherine Green, A. Conan Doyle, and others. "The Circu-Of course Bessie Mason wasn't buried | lar Staircase," by Mary Roberts Rinehart, an author comparatively unknown, is of the latter type.

This book is highly entertaining. Most of the action takes place at a of the mystery. Although the plot in places becomes rather complicated and the author resorts to the conventional secret chamber to clear up the mystery. the story is cleverly worked out, and the mystery is not cleared up until the last page. The story is narrated in an exceedingly easy and attractive stylebeing told by a rather garrulous spinster. The characters are well drawn. especially that of Jamieson, the detective. The death list is unusually large, five lives being sacrificed in the carrying out of the grim conspiracy of Mr. Paul Armstrong, the defaulting banker; but in the modern tale of mystery the higher the death list the more interesting the Taking all in all the story is one that will interest the many lovers of detective stories. Even the most hardened reader of this class of fiction will find his interest sustained, and himself deeply interested in the ghostly proceedings at the house at Sunnyside. The illustrations in the book by Lester Ralph are well done.

Traces National Ideas.

DROF, A. B. HART, of Harvard University has contributed the twentysixth volume of the twenty-seven which are to constitute the historical series. The American Nation, now being published under his editorship. Dr. Hart has chosen for his volume the admirable title, "National Ideals Historically Traced."

In the work he has considered the events of American history in the light of the achievements and ideals that tellectual life, of our business life, in have caused those events and that have resulted from them. In each chapter he has shown the ideals at work in the making of our history and the ideals national progression."

Waste in Electric Lighting.

"To show how coal is often was.ed. take for example its use for lighting purposes. Of the coal used in the development of electric lights, usually less than one-fifth of 1 per cent is actually converted into light, the remaining 994-5 per cent being consumed in the various preliminary formations of energy. This waste is appalling, and every possible means should be adopted for reducing it to a minimum, in order that our fuel resources may suffice for the future as well as for the present needs of the nation.

"With such a question to face, the most plausible plan to undertake is that of the location of engineering experiment stations over the country and especially where there are already engineering schools. For instance, a station of this sort would be of great importance to the University of Missouri. We have been making considerable progress towards the establishment of such a station here.

He makes an analysis of the effect on our ideals of the dependent races, the Indian, straining free government and brutalizing our frontier; the negro, exasperating or alarming the whites; the Filipino, creating new problems and overturning old ideals. He concludes this division with a treatment of the history of American self-government and ideals of democracy and our theories of government.

One of the most interesting divisions of the book is the third. In this, Prof. Hart deals with the history and ideals of local government, the art of living and the American church. He attempts to bring out our ideals with relation to the organization and results of the various forms of American government. He lays special emphasis upon the ideal of equality in local government; the ideal of a strong federal government. which does not sacrifice local self-government, or a strong national unity; the growth and complexity of political parties; the ideals of living, such as those of physical comfort, of luxury, of pleasure and society, and of responsibility for the weak; the church ideals of common purpose, toleration, separa- copy. tion of church and state, and the union of science and religion.

Beginning with the twelfth chapter, Prof. Hart turns to a consideration of some of the social and economic activities of the American race. He discusses the ideals and history of our inwhich "a square deal" is the ideal of our transportation.
